107) Explain what is meant by stare decisis.

Answer: This means essentially "let the decision stand" and involves the process existing in the common law system whereby one judge's decision must be followed by another. This is the system of precedent whereby one judge's decision forms a precedent that must be followed by other judges in similar cases.

Answer: No, it's only at the same level or higher in the same court hierarchy (i.e., the B.C. Court of Appeal, the B.C. Supreme Court) that the decision must be followed. Every judge must follow Supreme Court of Canada decisions, but the Supreme Court of British Columbia need only follow the B.C. Supreme Court, the B.C. Answer: Because of the inequity and harshness of the common law, people petitioned the king for relief. The king appointed the chancellor and eventually the chancery courts to overcome the inflexibility and harshness of the common law rules. The body of law that developed was equity, and so it can be said that equity developed to supplement the common law because of the inadequacy and rigidity of the common law.

Answer: Students should note that it is not possible to define law in a single, all-inclusive way, and that philosophers have been trying to define law for centuries. Students should identify the different ways in which law has been defined. In particular, law has been defined in moral terms (natural law theorists), defined by looking at its source (legal positivists), and defined in practical terms (legal realists). For purposes of studying business law, law can be defined as the body of rules that can be enforced by the courts or by other government agencies. Students ought to recognize that this definition of law has limitations, as it does not suggest what is just or moral.

Problems with the common law included that stare decisis caused stagnation, and the remedies provided in common law were inadequate. This led to people petitioning the king for relief. Eventually this was taken over by the chancellor, and the Court of Chancery developed. The body of law called equity was developed by the Court of Chancery. It supplements the common law. Answer: Students should point out that equity is that body of law developed by the Courts of Chancery and may or may not be fair in modern terms. The student should comment on the inadequacies of the common law, including the use of stare decisis causing the development of common law to stagnate, and inadequate common law remedies. This led to people petitioning the king for relief. This was taken over by the chancellor and eventually the Court of Chancery developed. Equity then is the body of law developed by the Court of Chancery and it was intended to supplement the common law. Equity does not mean fairness, but that body of law developed in the Courts of Chancery, and it may or may not be considered fair by today's standards. The two courts' structures were merged, but not the bodies of law.

152) Explain the relationship between statutes, equity, and common law in our legal system, including a brief discussion on the historical development of these three major aspects of our law.

Answer: Students should explain how equity and common law are judge-made law and that statutes are made by parliament or by the provincial legislatures. They should also explain that equity was created as a supplement to the common law to overcome its harshness and rigidity. Since parliament is supreme, its acts override judge-made law, and therefore statutes override common law and equity. If there is no overriding statute, a judge will apply either equity or common law, depending on the subject matter and what is asked for in a given case. The constitutional authority of the body passing the statute with reference to the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Charter will determine its validity. The statute will normally only override judge-made law if its provisions are specific and unambiguous.

Answer: Students should describe the nature of Canada's constitution and the place of the BNA Act in it. They should point out that Canada has a constitution similar to Great Britain's, that it is unwritten in the sense that it is not contained in just one document, and that all of the great English constitutional traditions are also part of our constitution. These traditions include the rule of law, the Magna Carta, and the supremacy of parliament. Students should also state that the BNA Act was an act of the British Parliament, that it created Canada as a federal Dominion, that its primary significance today is that it divides powers between the federal and provincial governments, and that today it is called the Constitution Act, 1867.

Students' answers should show that they know not only what the BNA Act is but also how it relates to the other elements of Canada's constitution and the overall nature of that constitution.

The key to this question is a discussion of the prohibition on direct delegation. Students should explain how indirect delegation can be used to overcome the problems this creates. Answer: Students should summarize the traditional passage of bills from both a provincial and a federal perspective, making note of key differences. Provincially, bills are introduced in the Legislative Assembly with a first reading (usually without debate), followed by a second reading (and debate), then review (and possible amendment) by the Committee of the Whole, and a third reading (with final debate and vote). Mention should be made of the requirement of royal assent by the Lieutenant-Governor, noting that some legislation is effective immediately while other legislation is not effective until later proclamation. Federally, the process is similar, but not identical. Students should point out that federal bills are subject to three readings in each of two houses (the House of Commons and the Senate), that there are variations involving review by Committee, and that royal assent for federal legislation is by the Governor General.

There was a desire for overall entrenched rights that controlled the actions of government, government officials, and agents including the police. It is important that they indicate that the Charter only applies directly to governments but indirectly affects individuals' relations with each other because provincial and federal human rights legislation and other statutes must conform to the Charter. Answer: Here students are expected to discuss the three major limitations on the Charter (Sections 33, 32, and 1), but also to explain how those limitations work with respect to the application of the Charter in our courts. They should indicate that the purpose of the Charter was to limit the power of government. Section 32 limits the application of the rights and freedoms specified in the Charter to the federal and the provincial governments. The Charter applies to legislation, regulations, and bylaws passed by all levels of government, and it also applies to actions by government officials carrying out their official functions. The Charter applies to all representatives of the government exercising statutory authority, including police and other law enforcement bodies. The Charter does not apply to private relations between individual persons. Section 33 allows parliament or legislatures through legislation to override Section 2 and Sections 7 to 15. These are important provisions of the Charter. To override the Charter in this way, they must clearly state that the provision applies notwithstanding the specific provision of the Charter. This may be repeated every 5 years.

Section 1 allows reasonable exceptions to the application of the rights and freedoms listed. They must be reasonably necessary (justified) and must not go further than necessary to accomplish their reasonable goal. Therefore, the rights and freedoms set out in the Charter are not absolute.

158) Discuss why it is important for businesspeople to become familiar with the human rights legislation in force in your province.

Answer: Students should identify the federal legislation and the legislation currently in force in your province. The protected areas (such as services, employment practices, etc.) should be outlined, and examples of prohibited grounds of discrimination should also be raised. Students should explain how the duty to accommodate those facing discrimination applies, along with exceptions to this rule (e.g., bona fide occupational requirements, etc.). Students' answers should reveal that they understand compliance with such legislation should be regarded as a necessary cost of doing business.

159) Explain the role of human rights tribunals.

Answer: Both the federal and the provincial governments have set up special human rights tribunals authorized to hear complaints of human rights violations, to investigate, and, where appropriate, to impose significant sanctions and remedies. There are time limits to consider: a complaint before the CHRC, for example, must be filed within 12 months of the alleged incident. The Commission then proceeds to attempt settlement of the complaint through conciliation and investigation. If all else fails, a tribunal hearing is convened.
