ESSAY

1. Compare and contrast the principles of representative government and responsible government.

ANS:
Representative government describes a set of political institutions that include an elected legislative assembly. In early 19th-century Canada, the elected assembly represented and articulated the views of the people, but had no real power over the appointed councils. As a result, reformers campaigned for responsible government in which advisers to the governor would reflect the views of the elected assembly. That would mean that the members of the executive council came from the assembly and had its support.

2. What was the significance of Lord Durham's Report?

ANS:

The 1839 Durham Report provided a blueprint for solving the problems of assembly–executive relations, recommending that the principle of responsible government be implemented with respect to local affairs, so that the executive branch would govern only as long as it retained the confidence of the assembly.

Durham outlined a division of powers between local and imperial authorities such that in local matters the governor would follow the advice of colonial authorities, but in matters of imperial concern he would act as an agent of the British government. Durham also recommended that Upper and Lower Canada be united into a single colony of Canada, partly as one last attempt to submerge and assimilate the French.

The 1840 Act of Union amalgamated the colonies, but English did not remain the sole language of government operations for long. When it became clear that assimilation of the French Canadians would not be achieved, French was also recognized as an official language of the legislature. Moreover, most governments of the period were headed by a combination of English and French leaders.

4. Explain the six principles of the Canadian Constitution and how they were realized in Confederation.

ANS:

The six principles of the Canadian Constitution are responsible government, federalism, judicial review, the constitutional monarchy, the rule of law, and democracy. Responsible government refers to the idea that the advisers to the governor should reflect the views of the elected assembly. At the time of Confederation, that would mean that the members of the executive council came from the assembly and had its support. Federalism describes a division of powers between central and regional governments such that neither is subordinate to the other. The Confederation settlement was not entirely consistent with this modern definition of federalism because, in certain respects, the provinces were made subordinate to the central government. Judicial review refers to the power of the judiciary to declare laws invalid. After Confederation, the Canadian judiciary soon appropriated to itself the power to invalidate laws that violated the federal–provincial division of powers, but were otherwise restrained. Like Britain, Canada is a constitutional monarchy, where the Crown is the head of state but rules according to the Constitution, and the Constitution has put most of the powers of government into someone else's hands. The rule of law means that all government action must be based on law and that government and government officials must obey the law. In other words, the law is supreme, and no one, including the lawmakers, is above it. Finally, Canada is a democracy. In Canadian terms, democracy has four components: popular sovereignty, meaning that the people ultimately rule, primarily through periodic elections; political equality, meaning that everyone has one vote on election day; political freedom, meaning that during and between elections people are free to organize and advocate for political purposes; and majority rule, meaning that except in defined situations designed to protect minority rights, the will of the majority prevails.
