69. Enlightenment philosophers, such as John Locke, had a new vision about the roles of government and citizenship. How did Locke’s vision differ from the views of government and citizenship up until that time? In what ways did his writings influence the founding fathers?

Ans: Students should discuss the novelty of Locke’s argument that rights are natural and that the people are sovereign, as well as the concept of a social contract. Thomas Jefferson modeled the Declaration of Independence after the arguments made by Locke in “A Second Treatise on Government.” Jefferson’s argument for revolution was based on the fact that King George had violated Britain’s social contract with the colonies

70. Why did the Articles of Confederation ultimately fail?

Ans: For the same reason it was created in the first place: It did not provide for a strong central government. The federal government could not tax or draft soldiers, lacked the ability to regulate commerce between the states and between states and foreign powers, and could not establish a stable and common monetary system. Some also argue that it failed because it did not include a Bill of Rights

71. Identify and discuss the three major compromises adopted at the Constitutional Convention. What issue did each compromise address? What were the concerns of each side? How was the compromise achieved? How well do you think each of the compromises has worked?

Ans: Students should discuss federalism, the Great Compromise, and the Three-Fifths Compromise. Federalism was a compromise between supporters of a strong national government and supporters of strong state governments. The Great Compromise was a compromise between the large states and the small states. The Three-Fifths Compromise was a compromise between supporters and opponents of slavery. Federalism divided sovereignty between the states and national government; the Great Compromise divided representation so that the large states were well-represented in the House, while the small states had equal representation in the Senate; the Three-Fifths Compromise provided slave states with more power in the House than they would have with slaves not being counted for representation, but less than if they were counted as whole persons. Students should note that federalism did not solve the problem of the status of the states, nor did the Three-Fifths Compromise end the conflict over slavery. Both required a civil war for resolution

72. What were the two major plans presented at the Philadelphia Convention, and what were the major provisions of each? How were the plans reconciled? Who do you think the winners and the losers were at the Constitutional Convention? Why do you think the winners were winners and the losers were losers?

Ans: Students should discuss the differences between the New Jersey and Virginia Plans, especially with respect to representation in the legislature. The plans were reconciled in the Great Compromise. The Big Picture: How We Got to the Constitution From the Articles of Confederation provides a good summary of the differences between the two plans, the Articles of Confederation, and the Constitution. The last two questions are more analytical than factual. Students should think about actors such as large states and small states, slave states and non-slave states, and Federalists and Anti-Federalists

73. Explain the nature of the conflict between the Federalists and Anti-Federalists. Who were likely to be Federalists and Anti-Federalists? How did each group view human nature and the role of government?

Ans: Students should mention the disagreement over where government power should lie. Federalists thought it should ultimately lie in the hands of a national government, while Anti-Federalists thought it should ultimately lie in the hands of local governments. Federalists were likely to be people who had a considerable economic stake in the new nation because they fared poorly under the Articles of Confederation. They tended to be students of the Enlightenment who believed that ambition and corruption were inevitable parts of human nature. As a result, Federalists believed a strong federal government was needed to maintain security and order. Anti-Federalists tended to come from more modest economic backgrounds and rejected the view that ambition and corruption were inevitable. They also believed that government could best function on a smaller, local level

74. In Federalist No. 10, James Madison wrote about the danger of factions. Why did Madison think factions were problematic, and how would the new Constitution keep them under control?

Ans: Madison thought that factions would lead to majority tyranny and pit the haves against the have-nots. Madison believed that a republic would dilute the effects of factions and that a large republic would create a number of factions, which would keep one from getting too powerful

76. Compare and contrast the modern-day Tea Party movement with the Sons of Liberty and the Tea Party of the Revolutionary War time period. Additionally, discuss how living in a Web 2.0 world affected the growth of the modern Tea Party movement

Ans: Students should be able to explain that the Sons of Liberty and the Tea Party demonstrators of the revolutionary period dedicated their efforts to completely overthrowing the existing government and advocated using dramatic and violent means to do so. The modern day Tea Party, on the other hand, is led by individuals who use strong language and may claim to want an entirely new form of government. However, they do not advocate violence, nor do they want the existing political structure completely dismantled. Only a minority of people who say they identify with the Tea Party want an actual government overthrow. The tendency of stories and issues to go viral on social networking sites and online news agencies has greatly helped the growth of the modern-day Tea Party movement
