Essay Questions

61. What causes conflicts in a family-owned business?

Family businesses are the backbone of America, but they can also be a source of unresolved family tensions and conflicts, which can create obstacles to achieving even the most basic business goals. When close relatives work together, emotions often interfere with business decisions. Also, unique problems, such as the departure of the founder-owner, develop in family-owned firms. When more than one family member is involved, emotions and differing value systems can cause conflicts between members. In fact, most people-related challenges faced by family businesses—small or large—result from the interactions of business necessity with family values and relationships.

62. Explain how a small family business owner must deal with incompetent family members working in the business.

Some family members want to become the head of the business but do not have the talents or training needed. Others may have the talents, but because of their youth or inexperience, these talents may not be recognized by other family members. Family members with little ability to contribute to the firm can be placed in jobs in which they do not disturb other employees. Sometimes, though, relatives can demoralize the business by their dealings with other employees or customers or by loafing on the job, avoiding unpleasant tasks, or taking special privileges. They may be responsible for the high turnover rate of top-notch nonfamily managers and employees. Such relatives should be assigned to jobs allowing minimal contact with other employees. In some cases, attitudes may be changed by formal or informal education.

63. How can family members working in a family-owned business be compensated?

Compensating family members and dividing profits among them can be difficult because some of them may feel they contribute more to the success of the firm than others. Compensation should be based on job performance, not family position. Fringe benefits can be useful as financial rewards, but they must conform to those given to nonfamily employees. Stock can be established as part of the compensation plan. Deferred profit-sharing plans, pension plans, insurance programs, and stock purchase programs can all be effective in placating disgruntled family members, as can a managerial title—if deserved. When success leads a company into the second generation, titles start to matter to the younger relatives. A title is perceived as a confirmation of a job well done and also tends to serve as a motivator. This technique must be used carefully, however, to avoid counterproductive behavior in the future.

64. What are the limitations faced by a family-owned business?

Entrepreneurs tend to be specialists in an activity such as marketing, production, or finance, so they usually do not make good general managers. Another problem is that family managers may feel it is necessary to clear routine matters with the top family member, regardless of his/her position or ability. Also, bottlenecks that work against efficient operations can be caused by personality clashes and emotional reactions. The number of competent family members from whom to choose the managers of the company is usually limited.

65. What are the advantages and disadvantages of organizing a family-owned business into a corporation?

Some families organize their businesses into corporations and hire professional managers to run them when no family members are in a position to manage, or no agreement can be reached on who should run the company. This solution has the advantages of using professional management, freeing family time for other purposes, reducing friction, and having employees treated more fairly.

The disadvantages of this arrangement, however, may be reduced family employment, lower income, concentration of power in small cliques, difficulties in finding and keeping a good management team, and loss of the "personal touch."

66. If you were a working mother, why would you prefer to establish a home-based business instead of looking for a corporate position?

In our "family-friendly" business environment many businesses are cutting back on flextime, job sharing, and paid family leave in order to continue to be profitable. This is a major reason mothers are quitting their current jobs and positions. One study of 400 employers indicates that job sharing, four-day workweeks, and telecommuting are decreasing. This creates an incentive for working mothers to establish a home-based business.

67. How can family business owners prepare their children to manage the business?

Often, children raised in a small business become bored or uninterested, or simply lack the drive and desire to succeed that had motivated their parents. The two primary reasons children follow in their parents business are to make money and that they like the business. One way to prepare children to take over the family business is to let them work on simple jobs, or on a part-time basis, which provides insights that may influence them into—or away from—the company. Children can also prepare by working for another company in order to broaden their training. Such experience helps justify moving a family member into the family business at a higher level. It is not a good policy for a son or daughter to work in senior management until he or she has worked for someone else for at least two years. Children should be rotated in varying positions within the business. Finally, if the newcomer is ready to learn the business, true responsibility must be given.

Learning Objective: 02-04 Discuss the importance and method of preparing for management succession.

68. Describe how a family-owned business may prepare for management succession in case the owner departs suddenly.

A successful business must continue to operate even when the owner-manager leaves. If the owner leaves on vacation, plans can be easily made because few decisions need to be made and the vacationer is available, if required. When the owner takes a vacation, a form of on-the-job training is provided for those left in charge. Those persons can take over temporarily under those circumstances. The sudden death of the owner can be very disruptive if not adequately provided for. If the owner has left no will or instructions on what to do, family members will probably have conflicting opinions about what should be done. For this reason, an owner should make a will and keep it current, including instructions about what should be done in-or with-the business. The firm can take out life insurance on the owners, the proceeds from which will go to the company in case of death. This money can be used to help the business operate until it recovers from the loss of its owner-manager.

69. Compare the advantages of selling a family business to family members with the advantages of selling the business to outsiders.

Selling to family members: Business stays in the family, provides a source of employment for family members, the family's stature is maintained, the former owner is free to relax or travel, there is pleasure when the successor is successful, it can strengthen family bonds, and finally, it can be sold to outsiders and later be repurchased by one or more family members.

Selling to outsiders: Owner is assured income, does not have to worry as to what happens with the business, owner has a possibility to consult, release of family tension, and further release from further responsibility; however, selling to someone outside the family can hurt the family since it marks the loss of something the founder built.

70. Discuss the different ways in which estate taxes can be minimized.

Estate taxes can be minimized using family gifts, family partnerships, stock sales to family members, and living trusts.

Family gifts: Parts of the estate may be given as gifts to family members as soon as feasible. The gifts must be of "present interest," such as direct cash gift, rather than "future interest," such as gifts of cash that can go into a trust fund for later distribution.

Family partnerships: A family limited partnership allows one to take money out of the business at lower tax rates. It must be a passive partnership that owns some type of property but does not operate the business.

Stock sales to family members: This method is complicated because family members must have a source of income to make nondeductible payments to the owner for the stock. Also, the owner must pay capital gains tax on the stock he/she sells.

Living trusts: A living trust resembles a will, but, in addition to providing for distributing personal assets on the maker's death, it also contains instructions for managing those assets should the person become disabled.
